When he achieved a one-hit and a no-hit game against our very armor-bearers, he was Dr. Hedgepeth, with a medicine so completely powerful in its subduing potency that we acclaimed him and dressed him in all the cloth befitting his accomplishment. Now, by courtesy, we call him mister. Driven from the hill—hill meaning the place whereon a pitcher in a ball game stands; this for the benefit of the purists—in the opening encounter, he was compelled yesterday to bow his kingly locks before the equally youthful attention of the purists.

Intertrates made a bid for the game in the ninth inning. With two men on bases, Garvin went in as a pinch hitter in Holloman's place. He drove out a hot liner to right field, and two runners crossed the plate. Howell, who took Hardin's place in the box, was the next batter, but was unequal to the occasion, however, and missed three good ones right over the plate. The score:

It was a dampening sort of performance at best. There was nothing about the day that invited even the faithful to make the trip to the yard. However, despite untoward conditions, something like 2,000 of the regulars, including many from the Land of Nutts—plural used advisedly—sat through the penetrating drizzle and watched what happened. At one time it was and the home plate.

Mr. Harry Hedgepeth was announced as the person who would oppose Doctor Yancey Wyatt Ayers in a pitefing encounter between the best Petersburg could offer and settled for something extraordinary.

Mr. Johnny Mace, son of Harry Mace, one-time umpire in the Virginia League, and Mr. Joseph Laughiin, never in all his life anything but a catcher of more than ordinary ability, were announced as the persons who

On each side there were nine men. Each team had a catcher, a pitcher, a first baseman, a second baseman, a third baseman, a shortstop, a left fielder, no game of baseball being complete, at least in professional baseball, without each of these players being in place. We make this explanation in deference to the aforementioned society.

There was a very appreciable drizzle when the game began. You may have sathered that much earlier, but we repeat it for emphasis. It wasn't a teasing sort of drizzle, but one of those kind that soak all the way through. However, the box office—but that hasn't anything to do with this story. As 0. Henry would say, let's hurry on. Royald Spencer, a recruit from the lineup for Petersburg and debutted by cracking a marvelous two-base hit to capture.
